ABSTRACT

Provided is a comprehensive overview of the manner in which each state government is organized to deliver services to the mentally handicapped (MH). An organizational chart is provided for each state which depicts executive level agencies serving the MH in areas such as special education, rehabilitation, day and residential services, welfare, social services, and health. A series of organizational charts on each of the individual agencies provides additional details on the important program subunits within the agency. Listed are functional statements on each subunit's goals. For example, the information on Alabama shows the Department of Education's Division of Instruction has a Program for Exceptional Children and Youth Section with a function of assisting in organizing classes. Appended is a chart giving a state by state breakdown of agencies responsible for administering various programs affecting the MH. (LC)

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The authors wish to express their appreciation to the hundreds of state officials who supplied the basic information and data upon which this study is based. Without their assistance this report would not have been possible.

A special vote of thanks is in order for state mental retardation coordinators who not only sent us information on their own agency, but also reviewed in draft form all materials concerning the state in which they are located. As a result of the latter review, we received numerous corrections and clarifications in the original draft manuscript.

We also want to thank Mr. Wallace K. Babington, Executive Director of the Office of Mental Retardation Coordination within the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. He encouraged us to undertake the study which led to this report and arranged a small contract with OMRC to help cover part of the costs involved.

Finally, we want to recognize the efforts of Mrs. Norma Gealt, formerly of the Association staff, whose patience and perseverance in typing and re-typing the initial manuscript was such an asset to the authors.

APPENDIX 233

PREFACE

Due to the chronic nature of mental retardation and the wide variation in the degrees and types of handicaps encompassed under this label, experts in the field have long recognized the need to involve a variety of professional disciplines in programs to train, treat and care for retarded children and adults. One outgrowth of this multi-disciplinary approach to programming has been the establishment of a number of separate spheres of program responsibility within the total structure of state government. Thus, for example, every state has distinct agencies (frequently within different executive departments) responsible for special education, rehabilitation, and day and residential services to the mentally retarded.

Several national study groups have concluded that an adequate, comprehensive attack on mental retardation requires the active involvement of a variety of state agencies. For example, the President's Panel on Mental Retardation said that "No single [organizational] pattern will be equally applicable to all states. . . . [However], in most states, at least 3, and perhaps as many as 5 major divisions of state government have, or should have, a responsibility for some significant segment of the program for the mentally retarded." The Panel went on to recommend that:

> Within each State department with a major concern for mental retardation, there should be a division or bureau to administer services to the mentally retarded or a special consultant with departmentwide responsibility for the development and coordination of these services.
> The division, bureau, or special consultant should be so placed in the administrative structure as to command the attention and exercise the authority necessary to carry out whatever function is involved. . . .[1]

Some years earlier similar conclusions were reached by a study group convened by the Council of State Governments.[2]

However, the attainment of the goal of active interagency involvement and coordination has proven to be elusive in most states, probably due to a variety of factors deeply imbedded in human and organizational motivation. As a result, administrative responsibility for mental retardation services is characterized by a striking degree of divergence from state to state, and there appears to be a continued groping for the "right" administrative solution in many states. Our Association and other national groups interested in the welfare of the mentally retarded receive a small but steady stream of inquiries from administrators and interested citizens who ask, in essence: "What is the best way to organize services for the mentally retarded? What state or states can be examined as an appropriate organizational model?" This study does not attempt to answer these questions directly; nonetheless, we hope, that it will contribute to a better understanding of current organizational patterns in the states and, in this way, serve as a useful resource document.

INTRODUCTION

Despite the tumultuous changes which have taken place in the field over the past few decades and the growing recognition of the need for multi-agency involvement in programming for the mentally retarded, little attempt has been made to document organizational patterns in the states relative to the administration of mental retardation programs. In general, the studies which have been conducted tend to focus on one specific area of state service and attempt to identify the agency in each state responsible for administering that program or activity. While such information is quite useful, in many instances it tends to ignore the complex relationships between various state agencies in meeting all the needs of mentally retarded persons. This, in turn, fosters an overly simplistic model of the service delivery system in the minds of professionals and consumer representatives alike.

I. Purpose of the Study

The purpose of the present study is to provide a comprehensive overview of the manner in which each state government is organized to deliver mental retardation services. In order to accomplish this objective, we have developed a series of simplified organizational charts on the major agencies involved in serving the retarded in each state plus concise functional statements describing the major duties of each sub-unit within these agencies. Every effort has been made to eliminate references to agencies and sub-agencies whose activities are extraneous or are only tangential to the interests of the mentally retarded (thus, the use of the term "simplified" organizational charts). One could argue, with some justice, that the deletion of these other agencies paints a false picture of the total environment within which mental retardation activities exist. On the other hand, the inclusion of material on literally hundreds and hundreds of unrelated agencies would not only have multiplied the size of this already voluminous document, but would have made the study practically incomprehensible to all but the most persistent student of administrative science.

It is our hope that the report will prove to be a useful source book for state administrators, federal officials, legislators, researchers, teachers, consumer advocates and others interested in the organization of state mental retardation services. The volume itself does not attempt to answer the major question which has long plagued social planners, administrators and interested citizens in the field -- i.e. how should a state organize itself to deliver a full array of services to all mentally retarded children and adults in an efficient and effective manner. Instead, we have attempted to provide empirical data on present organization patterns in the states which, hopefully, will facilitate the task of developing new and more effective organizational models for the future.

II. Methodology

The process of gathering information for the study was long and involved. Initially, the Secretary of State, or a similar official, in each of the fifty states and the territories were asked to furnish the Association with an organizational chart depicting the overall structure of state government and other materials which would facilitate completion of the project. Some 50 replies were received. These responses were analyzed to determine the major, cabinet-level departments or agencies involved in providing services to the mentally retarded. We consciously tried to include those departments responsible for the following activities: special education, rehabilitation, day and residential services for the mentally retarded, welfare, social services, and health. Other program agencies (e.g. recreation, transportation, employment, etc.) were not included unless specific mention was made of their activities in the area of service to the mentally retarded or the handicapped generally.

Next, follow-up letters were sent to some 212 state agency heads requesting copies of organizational charts and statements of the functions of each sub-unit with a major involvement in some aspect of mental retardation services. This often voluminous material was reviewed and digested into the accompanying charts and mission statements. Rather than attempting to crowd all information on a single organizational chart, an overall diagram was developed, followed by more detailed charts on each executive agency.

Because of the seemingly endless variety of formats in which information concerning agency functions was received, we began by developing a common statement of functions which might be performed by a number of types of agencies in different states. For example, we identified nine general functions which rehabilitation agencies in most states would carry out. The material received from the state agencies was used to verify the accuracy of this standard mold. Then, additional functions were added (or standard statements were deleted or altered) in order to tailor the list of functions to the mission of that particular agency.

III. Findings and Implications

As indicated above, the primary purpose of this study was to assemble, digest and disseminate empirical information on present organizational patterns in the states. We did not intend to offer "cookbook" solutions to the basic organizational problems surrounding mental retardation. Nonetheless, there are certain generalizations which can be drawn from the material assembled here.

First, perhaps the most striking feature of the data is the number and variety of agencies involved in delivering mental retardation services in all states. While the nature and extent of such involvement varies from agency to agency and state to state, it is notable that every state has at least three or four agency foci of program responsibility for mental retardation services. The extent of multi-agency involvement in mental retardation activities has been recognized for many years; however, this report, for the first time, provides detailed, graphical information documenting the degree of such involvement.

The greatest amount of diversity is apparent in patterns of organizing day and residential services for the mentally retarded. Despite recent reorganizations, responsibility for such functions rests with health, mental health, welfare, institutions, mental retardation, or consolidated agencies in the fifty states. Table II provides a breakdown of the types of state agencies involved:

TABLE I

M. H.[3]	11	11	10
M. R.	2	2	1
WELFARE	2	2	2
UMBRELLA AGENCY[4]	31	27	26
INSTITUTIONS	4	5	1
OTHER	2	3	10
TOTAL	54	51	53

Explanatory Notes:

1. Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands have no publicly operated residential programs.

2. Arizona does not participate in the DDSA program. It should also be noted that in 9 states the responsibility for administering planning, service and construction grants is divided among other state agencies.

3. Rhode Island has a Department of Mental Health, Mental Retardation and Hospitals; Ohio, Virginia and Texas have Departments of Mental Health and Mental Retardation; Illinois has a Department of Mental Health and Developmental Disabilities.

4. For the sake of this study, an umbrella agency is defined as any state executive department which has responsibility for administering six or more of the following eleven human service programs - the nine programs mentioned in Section 134(b)(2) of the Developmental Disabilities Services and Facilities Construction Amendments of 1970 (including the DDSA Act itself), plus community and residential services for the mentally retarded (see Appendix A).

Second, although no formal attempt was made to gather data on organizational trends, it was clear from the material received that there has been a definite trend toward greater visibility for mental retardation programs within the structure of state government over the past decade. This trend has been evidenced in a number of the following ways.

-- Identifiable units have been created in at least fourteen states to administer day and residential programs for the retarded. In these states, functions previously administered as part of another state agency or agencies (typically a mental health agency) have been detached, consolidated and/or elevated in status within the state structure. The establishment of offices, bureaus, departments and divisions of mental retardation in state after state provides evidence of this trend.

-- Similar developments are also apparent in other programs serving the mentally retarded and handicapped. Thus, for example, there has been a trend toward greater organizational visibility for special education services and, to a somewhat lesser degree, vocational rehabilitation programs over the past decade.

-- Even in those states where there has been no major organizational realignments, the trend clearly has been in the direction of increased identity for mental retardation programs. The establishment of top-level administrative positions and the creation of discrete sub-units within existing departments illustrate this trend.

In summary then, with very few exceptions, this movement toward increased organizational visibility for mental retardation programs has been evidenced in almost every state in one form or another. While these developments tend to be somewhat obscured by the continued variation in organizational patterns from state to state, the general direction of events is quite clear.

Third, to gain any understanding of current and future trends in organizing state services for the mentally retarded, we must first recognize that developments in this program area are profoundly affected by general trends in structuring state services. Possibly, the best proof of this fact is the impact that the current movement toward "umbrella" state agencies is having on the structure and location of mental retardation services. An analysis of the table in Appendix A of this report provides the following indicators of recent changes:

-- Twenty-nine states now have mental health and mental retardation programs in the same department as welfare and social services. Fifteen of these states have vocational rehabilitation as part of the combined executive agency.

-- Nineteen states now administer ten or more human services programs in a consolidated department of human resources.[3]

-- In nineteen states at least seven of the nine federal programs mentioned in Section 134 (b) (2) of the Developmental Disabilities Act (P.L. 91-517) are administered by a single state agency. If the responsibility for administering the Developmental Disabilities Act and community and residential services for the mentally retarded are also considered, then in thirty-three states one state executive department has responsibility for six or more of these eleven categorical programs (see table in Appendix A).

While historical or longitudinal information was not requested in the survey, it was readily apparent from the material received that the above developments were the result of major human services reorganizations over the past five years. For example, all but three of the nineteen state human resources departments were established within the past five years. The accelerating pace of change is underlined by the fact that nine of the sixteen departments were created within the past two years and three additional states joined the list just this year.

Another general organizational trend which is closely related to the establishment of umbrella agencies is the effort to strengthen the role of governors in dealing with the executive functions of state government. The emergence of strong state planning and budgeting offices, the strengthening of the governor's immediate staff, the four-year term for governors, the clarification and expansion of the executive's mandate are all indications of this trend.

Finally, the growing complexity and interdependence of state human services programs is reflected in the variety of local, state and federal funding patterns as well as in organizational configurations. This phenomenon is especially apparent in the field of mental retardation with the emergence of community-based programming for a growing number of clients and the resultant emphasis on use of generic funding sources. Local service programs for the mentally retarded, which up to a few years ago were operated largely through unilateral funding sources, now often draw upon a multiplicity of federal, state and local dollars to support their operations. Perhaps, the most notable development in this area has been the rapidly expanded use of welfare-related monies (e.g. social services, skilled nursing homes, intermediate care benefits and APTD maintenance payments). Interestingly, with few exceptions, the increased role of welfare-social service agencies in financing mental retardation services has not been reflected in significant organizational changes within such agencies. This fact may indicate that state public assistance agencies, inundated by a burgeoning caseload and public antipathy toward the "welfare mess," have tended to play a relatively passive role in delivering mental retardation services except in those states where other operational components of the M.R. program are part of the welfare agency's responsibility.

IV. Limitations of the Study

We would be remiss if we failed to warn the reader about some of the obvious limitations of the material presented and the study upon which it is based.

First, most of the data collection phase of the study was completed during the Summer and Fall of 1972. Since that time we have attempted to up-date the information as additional reports on state reorganizations were received. However, restructuring and redefining agency responsibilities is a continuing process in any large, bureaucratic organization such as state government. For example, as we go to press, we are aware of at least 6 states which are considering or about to implement major reorganizations which will have an impact on mental retardation services.

Second, although every effort has been made to verify the accuracy of the material included in this volume, it is quite possible that significant omissions or inaccuracies have crept in due to the difficulties inherent in an undertaking of this magnitude. For example, the simplified organizational charts, which were prepared by the project staff to assist the reader in visualizing the major components in a state's structure, are by their very nature, incomplete representations of the agency's structure. In the "weeding out" process it's possible that we inadvertently eliminated some vital elements.

As indicated above, this report is a pioneering effort and as such it should be viewed as an initial attempt to identify the parameters of agency involvement in the delivery of mental retardation services in each state. Undoubtedly, further refinements and elaborations will be needed as time goes on. In the meantime, however, we would appreciate hearing from readers concerning any major errors or omissions in the organizational charts and functional statements.

Third, as we indicated earlier, the purpose of this study is not to offer pre-digested solutions to the difficult problems involved in organizing a state's services to the mentally retarded. Each state must adopt an administrative structure which takes into account its own peculiar size, history, geography and socio-political climate. In our view, it is probably both fruitless and foolhearty to think that a uniform organizational format can be developed which will be equally applicable to solving the problems in any one of a number of states. Nonetheless, there are lessons which can be learned by studying the ways in which other states have structured programs - provided one does not lose sight of the organizational realities (both formal and informal) at home. This report is offered as a resource to aid in such an evaluation and assessment process.

Fourth, the study makes no attempt to delineate or describe intra-state systems for delivering mental retardation services although such information may be partially reflected in some agency's functional statements. Such information was outside the scope of the present study; nonetheless, we would agree that a grasp of state-local service patterns is usually essential to understanding any state agency's role.

Finally, the following charts and functional statements represent, at best, an accurate and reasonably complete description of the formal structure of state government as it relates to mental retardation services. As anyone knows who has ever worked in a large, bureaucratic organization, the informal lines of authority within an agency often have as much or more to do with the direction of agency policy as the formal organizational structure. This study makes no pretense to describe or to measure the impact of informal organizational variables, although we certainly are cognizant of their importance.

V. Organization of the Report

The report is arranged in alphabetical order by state. The material on each state begins with an organizational chart depicting those executive level agencies with a major role in delivering services to mentally retarded children and adults.

This chart is followed by a series of organizational charts on each of the individual agencies which provide additional details on the important program sub-units within the agency. Accompanying the agency's organizational chart is a functional statement of that agency's mission broken down according to its major organizational sub-units.

In both the organizational charts and the functional statements we have attempted to focus primarily on program related activities. Except in rare instances, administrative support and technical assistance agencies have been eliminated for the sake of simplicity and ease of understanding.
